This book is dedicated to my son's first mother,
Donna, his beautiful birth mother.

Today is our son's 16th birthday. Tears fill my eyes, as I remember many years ago, how she chose adoption because of her deep love and selfless concern for her son's best future.

God bless you across the miles!

Special Thanks

As we go into our fifth printing, I want to thank Heidi Keefer, Libby Denniston, and Heather Featherston who have thoughtfully updated this book to keep it relevant to modern women and families seeking answers and options for a child. Warm thanks to my hardworking staff, who have been so supportive and helpful with this book from the beginning, and faithful in sharing it with thousands of women across the country. And a very special thank you to the many counselors and medical professionals who have given this book to women considering an adoption plan for their babies and children.

CHAPTER ONE:

So I Was Thinking About Adoption...

I got pregnant when I was only 15...I was terrified to tell my mom, but then the day came when I couldn't zip up my pants any more and she found out!

Instead of going to school, she drove me to the doctor, with tears in our eyes. Turns out, I was already 5 months pregnant; guess that made sense, the baby was already kicking me all the time.

The thought of being a mother was a far-away idea. As my belly got bigger and my due date came closer, reality started to sink in.

I didn't have baby things or the money to buy them. I didn't have a job, heck I hadn't even finished high school. I think that is when I really started to consider my choices...so, I was thinking about adoption...

Megan

Let's be honest, women don't plan on choosing adoption for their children. You aren't reading this book because you want to be a "birth mother." You need help and want information. You need to learn more about the choices you have with adoption.

Your head may be spinning from your family and friends telling you what they think you should do. Parents tell you one thing. Friends tell you something else. Once you have the facts, you'll feel much more in control, and ready to make the right choices for the right reasons.

Before we start, let's get rid of some judgmental ideas or sayings about adoption and the people who choose it. They're outdated, hurtful, and just plain untrue. They go something like this:

- * She doesn't care or she wouldn't give her baby away.
- * Adoption is a big secret and she doesn't know what's going on.
- * She'll never forgive herself if she gives her baby away.
- * If she's old enough to get pregnant, she's old enough to be a parent.

These comments are NOT true, and people who say these things don't know what adoption is really like today.

In fact, women placing babies and children for adoption do so as a smart and caring way to provide a lifetime of love and stability for a child with an adoptive family of their choice.

Please read this guide all the way through before you make any decision. If you understand your options, and listen to what's going on in your heart and head, you will have greater peace about the choices you make. You will also have confidence that you are making the right decision for you and your baby for all the right reasons.

Why do women choose adoption?

Babies are hard work. You've got to feed, change, bathe, amuse, protect, and clean up after them. It's a big, 24/7 responsibility. As a mom, you've got to be ready to put your life and personal interests on hold to focus on your child. Your baby needs time and attention twenty-four hours a day.

But what if you're not ready to change your life or able to provide what your baby needs?

There are many reasons women choose adoption, such as:

- * Not ready to be a mom
- * Situations that prevent parenting, such as mental illness or jail sentence
- * No support from baby's father
- * Desire for a solid, two-parent family
- * Safety and stability
- * College plans
- * Opportunity for a solid future
- * Prior involvement with Child Protective Services
- * Cannot afford another child
- * Lifestyle
- * Rape

Whatever your reason for considering adoption, you are not alone. It's a personal decision. Women choosing adoption have an active role in every step of the process. Making an adoption plan means you can choose the parents for your child, meet with or get to know them, and decide about ongoing contact afterward. You can also receive counseling and even get help with pregnancy, living, or medical costs, if allowed in your state. You decide how things go. There is no wrong reason to choose adoption.

What kind of a parent would I be?

It's totally normal to consider what kind of parent you would be. Choosing your child's parents through adoption lets you evaluate what kind of parents they will be. But what about you? What kind of parent are you ready to be?

- * Are you truly able to provide for yourself and your baby on your own?
- * Is the father of your baby likely to help you financially and emotionally? If not, will you be able to cope by yourself?
- * Do you have school or work that will take up a lot of your time?
- * Have family and friends offered to help you care for your child?
- * Do your friends or family always do what they say they will?
- * Can you afford to feed, clothe, educate, and get medical attention for your child?
- * Can you give your child the kind of life he or she deserves? The kind of life you want for them?
- * Are you truly ready to change your life to become mom to your baby?

It takes courage to be honest with yourself. Your answers will help you focus on what you want for your baby.

Making a Lifetime Plan for My Child

Write out the thoughts and questions you have as you make a plan for you and your baby.

Start by listing what you can offer your child if you decide to parent:

1. Love
2. Family
- 3.
- 4.
- 5.

List what adoptive parents can offer your child through open adoption:

1. Love
2. Stable home-life & financial security
3. Emotionally ready & willing to be a parent
4. One or two parent home, or stay-at-home mom (if desired)
5. Ability to provide sports, hobbies, music, etc
6. Welcoming grandparents & other relatives
7. Quality medical, dental & eye care, and education
8. Vacations and traveling
9. Knowledge that you chose to give him or her this life, through adoption, out of love

HELPFUL TIP

Making a list can help you:

- Consider your choices
- See what you have and what you need
- Ask good questions and keep track of the answers
- Gain confidence about what you think and want
- Balance facts and emotions
- Make an informed decision and plan the next step

How do I know if adoption is a good choice for my baby?

If you're not ready to be a parent, or unable to take responsibility for the growth and development of your child, you can still give your baby the gift of life by choosing adoption. You can choose how your baby will be raised by selecting a stable, loving family for him. You can even choose a family with qualities that are important to you, like religious beliefs, lifestyle, or hobbies.

At birth, you can see your baby, hold him, and even name him, if you wish. As your child grows, you can have updates, such as letters, photos, phone calls or texts, and even visits. You can see him grow up strong, happy, and surrounded by a loving family. You can always be a part of your child's life.

Through adoption you can reach for your own goals, knowing your child is cared for in every way. Adoption may not be the right choice for everyone. You'll need to evaluate what you can provide and decide if that is enough for your baby.

Is it selfish to consider adoption? Is it selfish to consider parenting?

No. Neither decision is selfish if you are making it for the right reasons. Adoption can be one of the most unselfish decisions you

Are You Ready to be a Parent?

1. Do you have the financial resources to care for this child?
2. Do you have the help you need to raise your child?
3. Will those who are offering to help be there long-term?
4. Will the child have two committed parents?
5. How are you feeling emotionally about being a parent?
6. What do you want for your child's life?
7. What do you want for your life?
8. Are you and the father willing to sacrifice your lifestyle to be good parents?
9. What kind of childhood did you want as a child?
Can you provide that for your child?
10. Why do you want to be a parent?
11. Will being a mother make you a better person?
12. Do you feel that having a child will give you someone to love, or someone to love you in return?
13. Do you think parenting will keep you and the father together?
14. Do you know someone who has been in a similar situation?
What are the choices they made? How is their life now?

can make, giving your child the opportunity to have a family with the time, resources, and ability to cherish this baby just as you may want to do. With adoption today it's not goodbye forever; you can give your child the life you want him to have, stay a part of his life, and he'll know why you chose adoption.

It is hard to admit that you may not be able to be a mom right now. Parenting a child is difficult. Love is not enough to provide what a child needs to thrive. Even in a committed relationship or with the help of family and friends, being a parent is a full time job!

What is the difference between how adoption used to be and what it's like now?

Decades ago women choosing adoption were not given choices and control over what happened to their babies. They rarely had any say in who adopted the child or knew what happened after the adoption took place. Adoption records were sealed, meaning no family history, medical background, or contact at all.

Fortunately times have changed! TODAY a woman has control over her baby's adoption plan, including how much she's involved during and after the adoption. Modern adoption gives a woman choices, at her comfort level, such as who adopts her baby, if she wants contact afterward, how things go at the hospital, and more.

What are the benefits of a modern adoption for my child?

In an open, modern adoption, the benefits for your baby include:

- ✿ Your child will know that you loved him and wanted the very best for him.
- ✿ Your child will know why you chose adoption for him.
- ✿ Your child will grow up with the parents and lifestyle you chose for him.
- ✿ Your child will have the opportunity to receive information about his biological family.
- ✿ Your child will have the chance to know his genealogy and medical history or information.
- ✿ Your child will have the opportunity for ongoing communication with his birth parents.

What is the difference between adoption and foster care?

Adoption gives you the opportunity to choose the life you want for your child.

It is permanent, although you can choose to remain a part of your child's life. Right now, you have choices and control.

Foster care may be a short-term or temporary arrangement and it may or may not allow you any

"Wow! I know adoption was the right choice. It scares me to think I almost missed the opportunity to give my child and this family a forever gift."

-Heidi in Maine

choices regarding where your child will go. Most children placed in foster care in the U.S. are there because of neglect, abuse, or abandonment. Once a child is in the foster care system, it can be very difficult to get them back out.

If your child is currently in foster care, you may be able to make an adoption plan so that you get a choice in what happens next. To know your options, it's important to talk with an adoption coordinator as soon as possible. She can help determine the steps needed to have your child legally adopted into a permanent home, of your choice, at no cost to you. Contact the National Adoption Hotline to get the help you need: 1-800-923-6602.

The father of your baby

The father of your baby is usually referred to as the "birth father" in adoption language. Whether or not you are involved with him, parenting this child is his responsibility just as much as yours. If you decide to parent, he will have the obligation to pay child support, and the opportunity to share custody.

Ask yourself a few questions about your baby's father.

- * Is he someone you would want to grow old with?
- * Will he be a good role model for your child?
- * Is he responsible? Does he have a job?
- * Does he pay his own way?
- * Does he party, drink too much, or do drugs?
- * Has he been faithful to you?
- * Does he have other kids? What kind of father is he to them?
- * Do your family and friends like him?
- * Has he been in jail?
- * Are you putting your safety at risk by parenting this child?
- * Would you want your child to grow up and marry a man like this guy? Or would you want your child to grow up and be like him?
- * Is he kind to his parents?
- * Does he have a history of verbal, physical, or sexual abuse?
- * Does he follow through on what he says he will do?

I've been dating the father of my baby. Wouldn't it be better if we just got married and tried to raise the child together?

Perhaps, as long as you are not marrying simply because of the pregnancy. Marriage for the wrong reason has a greater chance of failure, compared to a relationship that has had time to develop without the pressure of an unplanned pregnancy. Be honest with yourself about your relationship with your baby's father. The decision to marry should be because you are both committed to each other and want to marry, not because you are having a baby together.

Think of what you want for your life before adding marriage and parenting. Don't put your child's future at risk if you and the father

Anna's Story

Anna knew she had to make a decision about her pregnancy, and soon. She was getting close to her due date.

Her mother said she should place the baby in a family with a mom and dad. Her boyfriend said he would pay to terminate the pregnancy. Her best friend said she should keep the baby. Her head was spinning. She didn't know what to do.

She decided to call a counselor. After a few hard, but caring talks, Anna was able to make a choice that was right for her and her situation. She wanted to move to another city until the baby was born, then place the baby with adoptive parents she had selected herself. Her boyfriend was relieved, and her best friend was upset for awhile, but got over it.

Today, Anna reflects, "Talking with someone else let me escape from the pressure I was under. I was able to honestly consider my baby's future, and mine too! When I met the family I chose, I felt they truly respected me. By doing what I thought was best, I could be proud of my decision. Ultimately, I did the most loving thing possible; I created a beautiful life for the child I created."

are not ready to give your full attention to being parents. It's okay to not be ready or to decide that you want more out of life before "settling down."

Consider what kind of home life you want for your child. Are you ready and able to provide a stable and safe home? Is your man? If not, adoption can offer the home life you desire for your child.

Your parents: The birth grandparents

Maybe your parents (your baby's birth grandparents) are supportive and want to be involved in the adoption plan. It's possible they were even the ones who brought up adoption first, or got information for you initially. Or maybe, your mom or dad don't understand what adoption is like today and are trying to change your mind about adoption. It may help to talk with your adoption coordinator about the situation with your parents.

It's important to know that even if you are very young, birth grandparents typically have no rights in adoption by law. They can't force you to parent your baby or to choose adoption, no matter your age. They might make it difficult and pressure you, but remember this is your decision. Many women have created a written adoption or parenting plan to present to their parents in difficult family situations.

CHAPTER TWO:

Writing It All Down...

Journaling

When considering all of your choices, it helps to write down your thoughts and emotions. Journaling can be a very personal and reflective journey as you decide what you want to do. Taking time to sort out feelings about your pregnancy, your baby, and your options is a healthy process.

Writing is also a good way to keep track of your questions and the information you learn so you can see what will work best for you and your baby.

You may be surprised by what comes out or seems more clear as you write about what you're thinking and going through. Journaling can be as simple or detailed as you want!

Kassie's Journal

March – Today is the day I never expected. Not now, not this way. I am staring at the pregnancy test, the one I took three times last week. But today, you were confirmed. The doctor says you are healthy. How can he know, you haven't even been alive for a month, but still something inside me feels you are here for a reason. I have thought about getting rid of you. I don't think I have it in me. I don't know where we will go from here, but I hope it works out. I am scared and a little lonely, but something about you brings me comfort.

April – I talked with your father today. He doesn't want you. I think he would love you, how could anybody not love you. But he won't pick up the phone anymore. He says he will pay for me to get an abortion. I told him I can't. My family doesn't know about you yet, I am waiting to tell them. You have two brothers and a sister. They don't know either. I started thinking about a name for you, but then I stopped. I am afraid I will not be the parent you should have.

May – I love you. You are getting bigger, I am gaining weight. I can't afford rent this month. I am not sure how I will take care of you. My friends say they would keep you. I wish your father would have stayed around; it would have been easier then. I am starting to cry a lot. My family is worried about me. I don't talk much about you. I am starting to doubt my decisions. I want you to know I want the best for you.

June – I called an adoption place today. I talked to them for a long time. They are texting me info on families to look at. I am confused and sad, but maybe there is a reason for it all. You are starting to move around. I talked to my family today. They think that adoption might be a good idea. I guess they are supportive. I still wish there was something I could do to make it work out. Maybe I will buy a lottery ticket.

July – I was nervous about talking to the adoptive family today. I want them to like you. They seem nice and their pictures are really cute. I can write you as often as I want and even see you. They live in the country with a big house. You would have a sister. All I want for you is to be happy and grow up loved. I started writing you a letter today to tell you how I feel. I will miss you.

August – I talked with another woman today who placed her baby for adoption four years ago. She said the first year is the hardest. She said she knows her baby is healthy and happy and she gets pictures all the time. She told me to keep loving you, even when it hurts. I think that was good advice. She said I will cry a lot and I will miss you, but she also said that healing takes time, and that you will have a beautiful life. I feel a little better.

September – I talked with your dad today. He knows about the adoption plan, he doesn't want to know about the family, but he said he will sign the papers. I wish you could have known him a little bit, but I hope you don't grow up like him. Your adoptive family called again. They are sending a baby blanket for when I deliver. Sometimes I get really confused about everything. I wonder about the life I could give you, and I wonder about watching you grow up. I wish I could make it work, but I know I can't give you what you need. Sometimes I wish I could make everything go away.

October – Today was a good day. You kicked a lot. I met the adoptive family. We went to the park. It was beautiful, and they are really nice. We talked a lot about your name. I think you will like them. They brought pictures of their pets and I met your sister. She is five. She talked to you and pressed her little hand on my stomach. She said she loved you. I hope you could hear her. The adoptive family will be there at the hospital. I am getting a little nervous and a little excited.

November – I am ready to be done now. There are still a lot of emotions going on. The hardest thing is dealing with my family. They think I don't love you, but that's not true. I love you so much! I want you to have everything that I can't give you. I wish you were old enough to understand. This is the hardest thing I have ever done. I hope that one day you will learn that this was the most unselfish decision I have ever made.

December – I delivered you today. You are beautiful. Somehow I thought it would be different with the adoptive family there. They love you already. I love you still. I watched you smile and wondered if you will look like that ten years from now. I got to hold you and say my goodbyes and I stayed up to watch you sleep. There is a lot I wish I could say, but somehow words don't seem to be enough. They will make a good family, and you will be a good daughter, and I hope when I see you, you will remember me. I am keeping your baby footprints and your I D bracelet and even though it hurts, I know in my heart that this is the right choice.

It's Never Too Late...

Jasmine's Story

When I was pregnant I thought about adoption.

It was so hard to decide what was best for him and I ended up taking him home to try and make things work. Now that I've been doing this 3 months I'm not sure how much longer I can struggle to take care of him the way he needs.

I love my son, and I want more for him than going from baby-sitter to baby-sitter while I try to work and keep up. My family thinks I'm exaggerating, but they aren't really there to help us and things aren't getting easier. He's growing so fast and I want him to have the stability and attention he needs and deserves.

I know there are adoptive parents who would adopt a baby of any age and I'm looking through the information about families I can choose to adopt him. I've been writing down what I want for Josh's life, for his childhood, and for his future. This could be good for both of us.

I'm so glad it's not too late to think about adoption.

My Inspiration

“I know it might seem odd, but this pregnancy made me look at what I believe. It’s been a good time for me to read verses and writing about what they mean to me.”

—Mallie

“After my daughter’s birth I felt lost and alone. A friend helped me find a group online of other women who made an adoption plan. It was a huge relief to talk with someone else who knew what I was going through.”

—Natalie

“My mom was great through the whole thing, but I still didn’t know what to do. I started talking to a counselor who was familiar with adoption. She gave me some tips that helped me make a decision I know I can live with.”

—Danielle

Questions to Interview Adoption Professionals

As you research adoption, ask any questions on your mind, including:

- What hours can I reach you?
- What happens if I need help on the weekend or at night?
- How many families do I get to choose from for my baby?
- Do you offer counseling?
- What are your services for birth parents?
- What kind of support will I have during and after the adoption?
- When can I speak with adoptive families?
- Can I speak with other women who used your services?
- What kind of adoptions do you coordinate?

"I never imagined..."

Julianne's Story

"I always thought adoption was such a good thing for women who were in high school, or homeless, or dealing with child services. You know, the stories you hear about on TV. I never thought this would be a decision I'd face when I became pregnant a third time. I'm 32, have a good job, and my youngest just started school. My kids' dad doesn't pay child support regularly, but I never minded before. But now, with a baby coming, and knowing I won't be able to work for a while, I'm really worried about how I'll pay the bills and continue providing for my 5 and 8 year old. Plus, the father of this baby hasn't talked to me since he found out I was pregnant. I am pretty sure I can't count on him for help.

I don't know what to do, but I have started to think about adoption. I love being a mom, but I also know how much it takes. I don't want any of my children to sacrifice or miss out. I think adoption may be a decision a woman like me needs to consider. I see now that adoption isn't just a choice for 'certain' people. I'm trying to do what is best for all of us."

CHAPTER THREE:

I Have a Few Questions...

Here you'll find answers to questions you may have about how adoption works. You can get answers, at any time, for your specific situation too. Connect with caring help when you call or text the National Adoption Hotline at 1-800-923-6602.

1. Are there any costs to me?

No, you will not need to pay for anything. Adoptive parents pay for legal fees, medical bills not covered by insurance, and counseling fees. The family may also be able to provide assistance with pregnancy related expenses to help you, which can include rent, food, and transportation, depending on state laws.

You also can receive help with some of your needs such as maternity clothes and other necessities from places like BirthmotherBlessings.com.

2. Will I have any say in who will adopt my child?

Yes. You absolutely have a say in who will adopt your child! In modern adoption, you can select the parents who will raise your baby. Adoptive parents have websites, videos, and photo booklets to help you learn about them and the life they want to offer your child. You can talk with them, get to know them at your comfort level, and even meet in person. Your adoption coordinator will ask questions about you, your situation, and your baby, to show you families available for you to choose from.

3. How can I be sure that the family I choose for my baby are good people?

Every family who wants to adopt goes through steps to meet certain qualifications in order to be approved to adopt a child. Your adoption professional will screen the adoptive families working with them. A licensed social worker will also do a detailed home study evaluation, including a background check, medical and financial evaluations, FBI screening, and visiting the adoptive family's home. The home study process takes weeks to complete and ensures that approved families are safe, healthy, and stable.

You can be assured that your baby will be raised within a loving and safe family environment. If you'd like, you can talk or video chat with adoptive families to interview them yourself!

4. How much will my child know about me?

Before the adoption, you'll share details about your pregnancy, family medical history, and other things that will be helpful for your child to have as a foundation while growing up. As you and the adoptive parents get to know each other, they'll learn even more about you that they can pass on to your child.

Everything you share is a part of helping your child know his or her background or medical needs, and that this decision was made out of love, to give them the best future possible. You may even want to write a letter to your child to read when he gets older.

CALL OR TEXT:

1 (800) 923-6602

National Adoption
Hotline

If you choose to stay in contact after the adoption, you might exchange letters and photos, be connected on social media, have phone calls, texts, or video chats, or plan occasional visits. It is entirely up to you how much contact you want with the adoptive family and your child.

5. What if my child is older, can I make an adoption plan?

There are loving families seeking children of all ages and races. Your adoption professional will work hard to find just the right family for you to consider for the adoption. You will be able to decide on the type of contact you wish to have after the adoption.

6. What if my child has a disability or medical problem? Are there adoptive families available?

Yes, there are adoptive families that are prepared and willing to provide a loving and supportive home for a child with special needs. There is a loving and safe home for every child. Just call or text the National Adoption Hotline at 1-800-923-6602 and receive details on how to get started.

7. What if I go into labor and have not made an adoption plan?

You can contact an adoption professional directly from the hospital, 24 hours a day. The adoptive family you choose can be there within hours. In most cases, the adoptive parents will be able to take the baby home from the hospital, if you wish. Adoptive parents are ready to start bonding and caring for the baby as soon as you're ready for them to step in.

If you are concerned about Child Protective Services, it is important that you know you have the right to make an adoption plan for your child. You have the choice to decide the type of home you would like your child to grow up in, instead of the foster care system.

There are adoption professionals available for emergencies on all weekends, holidays, and throughout the night, call or text 1-800-923-6602 anytime for help.

8. What if I change my mind and decide I want to raise my child myself?

Before all forms are signed, you may change your mind. It's recommended that you make this decision sooner than later since the longer you wait, the harder it will be. For now, go slowly and take things one step at a time.

If you want counseling, be sure to request it. Remember there is no cost to you. Counseling may help you clarify your feelings and just because you feel sorrow or guilt, it does not mean that your decision to move forward with adoption was incorrect. This is a good time to evaluate if your situation has changed, and to review the reasons you chose adoption in the first place.

9. Does the father of my baby have any say in the adoption?

His rights are similar to yours and vary by state. If the two of you disagree about adoption, or if you are no longer together, your adoption professional will work with an attorney to determine if his rights can be terminated. For legal reasons, he will most likely have to be contacted, but you don't have to be the one to do it. If you don't want to speak to him, share your concerns with your adoption professional.

It is always easier for you if the child's father signs a waiver and provides his medical information. If he is not willing or is not around to do this, an adoption plan is possible without his participation. However, if he is known, he must be notified of the adoption. The attorney working for you will advise the father of your decision and let him know his options.

10. I am a single parent and facing a prison sentence. Can I find adoptive parents for my baby or older children?

Yes. If you want to make a permanent adoption plan for your baby or children, an adoption professional can work with you in finding a loving adoptive family. You can still choose the adoptive parents and talk with them before the adoption takes place. It's even possible to have future contact, such as sharing updates, letters, or photos, if the prison allows.

If you are already in prison, you may still have the option to make an adoption plan for the baby you're pregnant with, or other children being temporarily cared for by family or foster care. Contact an adoption professional immediately so that you know what steps to take, and what options are still available.

11. I am homeless and pregnant. Is there a home for mothers or a place for me to go?

Yes, services and assistance may be available to you. Depending on your age, you will have a variety of support services such as relocation to another town, sharing a home with another birth mother, maternity care homes and studio apartments. Your adoption coordinator can help you find housing, and they sometimes have families that are interested in housing a birth mother for the term of her pregnancy. Some women want to move to another area until after the baby is born and others want to stay in their own town. Much will be determined by how far along you are in your pregnancy, what your situation is, and your plans for your child.

If needed, they will refer you to other services, answer your questions and provide useful information to help you decide what your options are. If you are in this situation, it is best to call or text the National Adoption Hotline as soon as you can at 1-800-923-6602, so it can be decided what your needs are and get help for you quickly.

12. I need help paying my medical bills and my rent. Can the adoptive parents help me with this?

In many states, adoptive parents may assist with certain pregnancy-related expenses, such as living and medical expenses. If you have state or private medical insurance, the adoptive parents may be able to pay any portions unpaid by insurance, such as co-payments. Living expenses may include rent, utilities, food and transportation. In some cases, living expenses may even be paid up to four weeks after you deliver.

Be honest with your adoption coordinator about your needs and she can get you the help available. Before receiving any help with expenses, she will ask you to fill out the required forms, choose the adoptive parents, and together agree that you are making an adoption plan with each other. Even if you don't qualify for help with expenses, your coordinator can help you find local help.

13. Are there families of other races to adopt my baby?

Yes! You may view waiting adoptive families of many races by visiting:

You can read about the lifestyle of these families and view their photos before speaking to them by phone. Many families may not be racially diverse themselves, but are open and willing to provide a loving and supportive home for a child of any race.

If you have more questions than are answered here in this chapter, remember there is no such thing as a silly question. Call or text to connect with someone 24 hours a day at the National Adoption Hotline, 1-800-923-6602. It's important to get answers you need as you make a plan for you and your baby.

Questions to Answer

Adoption services are confidential, even when you're just researching. It helps to provide information about yourself, your pregnancy, and your situation so that you get more specific answers and resources. Here are a few questions you might be asked as you consider adoption:

- What are your reasons for thinking about adoption?
- Do you want to receive information by mail or email?
- When is your due date or when was your child born?
- How much prenatal care have you had so far?
- What is your child's racial background?
- What do you already know about adoption?
- What kind of contact would you like after the adoption?
- What are you looking for in adoptive parents?
- Do you work or go to school?
- Is your baby's father involved?
- Do your friends or family support adoption?
- What questions do you have about adoption?

CHAPTER FOUR:

Spilling the Beans...

The thought of telling the people closest to you about adoption might seem a little scary. You don't have to tell anyone, if you don't want to, because all of the services offered to you are confidential. This decision is up to you, as is who knows about your plans. However, it may be easier, or even helpful to you, in the long run if you're honest with those closest to you, or connected to this child.

If you decide to tell people you are thinking about or choosing adoption, it's best to tell them when you feel you have their attention and some privacy. This means being honest with yourself first and then being honest with your friends, family and the father of your child. Your adoption professional can even answer any questions your family or the baby's father may have as well, with your permission.

Your friends...

In theory, true friends are supposed to be with you for the long haul. That means that if you decide to tell them about your pregnancy then they should be supportive of whatever decision you decide is best for you and your baby. However, they may have different reactions at first, so be prepared. They might not completely understand or try to talk you out of adoption.

Remember, friends often want to be helpful and they may tell you that they will support you or even help take care of the baby. The truth is that babies take a lot of work, and while your friends might be willing to help you in a crunch, in the long term they won't be able to provide the kind of support you need. Keep your good friends close and ask them to help you through the hard times. They can be good support for doctor's appointments or counseling, or even to help you tell your family that you are considering adoption for your baby.

Your parents...

If you are looking for some advice on how to tell your parents, the best approach is to be mature. Tell them that you need to talk to them about a serious matter and ask them to be respectful and not to interrupt you until you have finished. Explain to them what is going on and ask for their support, understanding and help.

This news is likely shocking to your parents, so have a little understanding and patience with them. Realize that they might seem angry, but handling the conversation with maturity will make a huge difference. Try to avoid arguing, even though it might be hard. Give them time and space to digest the information. Ask if they'd like to be involved in your adoption process, or if they have questions. Hopefully, when they've had a chance to get past the shock, you'll be able to share what you've learned, why you've chosen adoption, and how they can best support you.

Wendy Shares her Plans

Wendy was 23, living at home with her parents and her 3-year-old son. When she found out she was pregnant, she was fearful of what her parents' reaction would be. She called me and we spoke on the phone. We developed a plan just for her. I gave her suggestions on how to talk to her parents, to pick the best time, along with the details to prove she had been responsible enough to think it all out.

Wendy was sure of her decision about adoption. She decided to focus her time and energy on her son and to continue working.

I also offered to speak to her parents and to be a support to her the night she told them.

Wendy's parents were disappointed, but not surprised, as Wendy had begun to show. When Wendy shared their reaction, she said it went better than expected, with her plans in hand and her thoughts in front of her. She was able to explain to them how open adoption works, and how she had thought through all of her options. She was able to give intelligent answers to their questions.

Narrowing the choices down to two adoptive families' profiles she thought were perfect, she knew exactly what to show her parents.

The birth father hadn't wanted anything to do with her once he found out she was pregnant. In fact, he had told her to get an abortion. Wendy had already had one abortion and had no intention of having another.

She asked for help with her expenses from her adoptive family for the last month of her pregnancy, and the adoptive parents agreed.

She continued to work as a store clerk throughout her entire pregnancy, delivered her baby, and then went back to work and to night school. She receives yearly photos and updates about her daughter. She admits that her adoption plan was hard to put down on paper because it made it real to her, but it also helped her in realizing that it was the best thing she could do for her baby and her son.

“When my daughter was born, I just looked at her,” Wendy said. “I studied her fingers and toes and kissed the top of her head. I told her how much I loved her and how wonderful her life would be with two people that loved her as much as I did.”

“Then,” she continued, “I knew I had done the right thing. The adoptive parents came in and carried her home as we had planned, and although I cried for the next three days, I never had a doubt that what I did wasn’t the best for her and us. I have learned a lot since my adoption and I know the choice I made was one I thought out and planned. I have no regrets.”

Baby's father...

When thinking about talking with the father, there are many things to think about and consider:

- * Do you feel he will be supportive?
- * Do you think he will stick with you for the long haul?
- * Do you think he will eventually marry you?
- * What are his goals and dreams? Do they align with yours?
- * Is he ready to be a father?
- * Is he willing to support you in telling your parents?
- * Is he willing to take responsibility for his actions?
- * Has he considered what you want for your life?
- * Has he been responsible for his decisions?
- * Is he financially responsible?
- * How do his parents feel?
- * Does he have other children?

Be honest with yourself about the situation with your baby's father. Whether or not you're still together, you'll need to think through what raising this child with him will be like. Consider the following questions:

- * What do you think his reaction will be once he finds out you're pregnant?
- * Do you want him involved in your life - for at least the next 18 years?
- * Is he willing or able to pay child support?
- * Is he the type of father you want for your children?
- * Will he be a good role model?
- * If he is violent, have you called the police or reported him?
- * Does he have a criminal history?
- * Does he struggle with any addictions?
- * Is he able to hold a job?

Take all of these things into consideration, for the well-being of your child. If you're concerned about your safety, or that of your baby, talk with your adoption professional about the best way to handle his side of the adoption planning.

Planning ahead...

Before you have any of these conversations, these are important issues to consider:

- * How will you provide for the child financially?
- * Where will you live?
- * Do you have help?
- * Are you and the father still together? Do you plan on getting married?
- * Does he work or is he willing to start?
- * Do you have reliable transportation?
- * What are your plans for finishing school?
- * Make a list of your goals for the next two years—how will the child fit into these?
- * What are your expectations from your parents?
- * If your parents provide support for you,
 - > Are you willing to listen to their rules?
 - > Are you willing to let them help you decide how to parent?
- * Is making an adoption plan something you are willing to consider?

If the answer to the last question is yes, then let's move ahead. Do you feel comfortable sharing your decision with your family, friends, and the father? Where do you find the most support? Making an adoption plan is a personal decision, and it can help to have those you trust there to support you in your plans.

You can share the profiles of the adoptive families you like with them, so that your family can see the loving parents you have chosen. You can also have them help you write a letter to your child, or ask them to come with you when you meet the family, if you want.

It's also up to you who is with you at the hospital.

Take the time to honor your feelings and your needs during your pregnancy. Be honest with those closest to you, so they can help and support you through this. Give them a chance to understand why you're choosing adoption and what you need from them.

How to Tell Your Kids About Your Adoption Plan

If you have kids, you may wonder how to talk with them about this pregnancy and your adoption decision. Depending on their age, you can find a way to tell them that you are going to have a baby, but are not able to take care of the baby, or how babies need lots of attention, and you may not be able to care for more children right now. It may even help to explain a little about what you're doing to provide for this baby through your adoption plans.

Tell them that you have found a family who want a baby to love, and that they are going to take care of the baby. Reassure your child that they will still live with you, and how much you love him and the new baby. Even with adoption, they will always be siblings. If it feels right, it may even help for your child to meet the family you've chosen to adopt this baby, and talk about how you'll keep in touch after baby is born.

You know your kids best, and you know what they will be able to handle and understand. It may also help to first discuss this with a trusted friend, relative, or counselor who knows your child.

Here is a children's book that helps explain adoption:

Sam's Sister by Juliet C. Bond

Open Adoption...as a Birth Family

Maria's Story

I remember my 17 year-old daughter, Alexis, sitting down to tell me she was pregnant. She was 11 weeks along and was sure Juan, her boyfriend, would marry her. I promised to keep an open mind even though I was upset. Alexis was a smart girl and had goals for college. Both she and Juan were determined to make this work and got weekend jobs to prove to us that they could save for baby and be a family.

After three months, both kids were tired of working every weekend and bickering about little things. We talked about adoption as a way to give this child parents who were ready for parenthood. It definitely was sad, but the kids started to view adoption with relief. They could go back to a "normal" routine and pursue their goals. Working together, they picked a family to adopt the baby who would have annual visits with them.

I'm happy to report that I am "Grammy Maria" to the sweetest little girl, adopted by a family about four hours away. We have special family reunions each summer with both families, the adoptive parents, and little Gia. Alexis and Juan are in college, no longer dating, but special friends through the experience and decision they made together.

CHAPTER FIVE:

The Real Deal About Parenting & Adoption...

Sure, parenting starts out with a cute cuddly baby that is going to love you and look to you for guidance and protection. But there is a lot more to parenting than that.

Being a parent is a full time job, with a lot of responsibility. It is important that you think about how being a parent may change your lifestyle permanently.

Right now you may be thinking how hard it will be to place your child with an adoptive family. True, making an adoption plan is never an easy decision, but deciding to raise a child is difficult too. If you're thinking about the best long-term plans, adoption is one loving way you can provide what you want for your child's childhood and future.

COST OF RAISING A CHILD FROM BIRTH TO AGE 18:

Total Cost

$238,646*

$67,500 in housing

$50,292 in food

$35,046 in transportation

$14,022 in clothing

$21,024 in healthcare

$34,400 in childcare and education

$16,362 in other expenses

A Life Changing Decision

My story is probably similar to many of you. I'm an 18 year old woman, who thought she had it all together. Well, actually not all of it, but enough to parent my first daughter. I am not going to lie; having her has been the hardest and most wonderful journey of my life. When I got pregnant the first time, I figured that it would be difficult, but somehow we would make it work. I thought that the baby's father would eventually learn to love me, but he took off, and that left me alone to raise my daughter. Without the help of my parents, I don't think I would have made it this far.

At first she was so cute. She would snuggle with me and we would cry together, and eventually my body healed, and I was actually making it work. My parents watched her in the morning while I went to school and then I would get home and take over. It wasn't much harder than a new puppy at first. I would show her to all my friends and we would talk bad about her dad, and somehow it made me feel a little better. But then she got bigger and I couldn't carry her everywhere. And she kept growing out of her clothes needed more food, and pretty soon all of the extra cash I had saved was gone.

When she turned two my parents asked me to move out. Move out? What do you mean move out? I just graduated in June from high school, what kind of job am I supposed to get? It is now October, and I have been forced into the working world of waitressing by necessity. My daughter now spends most of her time in day care, and when I really want to take a break and go out with my friends, I have to go home and be mom. As you can imagine, there aren't many guys my age who are willing to stick around long term to raise a kid. So when I actually find a guy, the relationships are short, but not very sweet. I don't regret having her, but I do regret the change in my lifestyle. I don't feel like a normal 20 year old. I am struggling to make ends meet and working all the time, while all of my friends are out partying and having fun.

This leads me to my current need to write every girl who is out there banging her head against the wall, wondering what to do about this next unplanned pregnancy. This is my second one; you would think I would have learned the first time, but apparently not. This leaves me three options, parenting is out; I can't support another child all by myself. And I don't believe in abortion, so unless I win the lottery, that leaves adoption as my best option.

At first I was having a hard time thinking how I could carry this baby for nine months and then give it to someone else. But I know I can't provide this child the life I would like them to have. I have been spending a lot of time talking with families, and there are so many that want to have a child to call their own. So far I haven't been very good at making the right decision, so maybe it's important that I think about someone other than myself.

I know this is going to be a hard decision, but it is the one thing I can do to make my life and my baby's life a little better.

Three out of five people are touched by adoption. Adoption is a decision that changes lives forever, but it can be one of the most amazing ways to bring people together. It has been a way for mothers to find peace knowing that a loving family will provide for their child.

With open adoption, birth mothers and adoptive families alike can be just as involved in creating the best life for the child.

"I think what helped me the most was knowing I could make all the decisions. If someone had tried to tell me what to do I think it would have made things harder. I knew it was my choice, and someday my twins will know that adoption was the best thing I could do for them. I miss seeing them more but I set it up so I'm still part of their lives."

- Angelina in Texas

"I knew that my options were not going to be easy. I had to provide my baby with the life he needed, but I couldn't do that unless mine was on track. Every time I see him with his adoptive parents, I know I made the right decision. I know he has what he deserves. I am so happy that they embrace me like family too!"

- Jessica in Missouri

CHAPTER SIX:

The Steps to Adoption...

Remember, many services are available to women making an adoption plan. Your adoption professional can refer you to a licensed family counselor to discuss any feelings you're having, at no cost to you. You can also receive help locating a doctor in your community, as well as legal and public aid. There are even educational scholarships available so you can continue your education. Call or text the National Adoption Hotline at 1-800-923-6602 for more information about these resources.

So what do you need to do to make an adoption plan?

Here are the steps to follow:

1. Request information about adoption

When you first contact an adoption professional, you will be asked a few questions. Then you'll receive information about adoptive parents and how to get started.

2. Determine your due date

Pregnancies last about 40 weeks. To find out your due date, you can use an online pregnancy due date calculator here: PregnancyHelpOnline.com. Your adoption professional can also help you calculate when you are due.

It is normal to deliver two weeks before or after your due date. You will have an ultrasound where a picture of the baby is taken using sound waves and a computer. This helps confirm the due date, the gender of the baby, and can determine if there are complications.

3. Get the assistance you need

Dear Mardie:

“What is my baby doing at two months along?”

Mardie's Advice:

Her heart is beating, and she can turn her head, suck her thumb and respond to pain.

Financial and housing help are available to you if you need it. In most states, adoptive parents can pay some of your expenses once you are matched. The adoptive parents will have an attorney who will assist them in determining what they can and can't pay for.

It is important that you are comfortable with the adoptive parents and the adoption plan you have chosen before accepting any financial assistance.

If you need help now, visit BirthmotherBlessings.com for free help with maternity clothes and other necessities.

4. Start your adoption plan

Complete the required information to get your adoption plan started, including basic paperwork and submitting a proof of pregnancy (or a birth certificate if your child is already born). You can complete the paperwork online or get a copy to fill out by fax, email, or postal mail. The paperwork will include questions about you, your medical history, the level of contact you wish to have after the adoption, and other forms to share about your pregnancy or child's health. If you have any questions or need help filling it out, just call or text the National Adoption Hotline at 1-800-923-6602.

5. View and select the adoptive families

Learn about adoptive families available for you to choose for your baby by viewing adoptive parent profiles online at the websites listed in the resources section in the back of this book.

Your adoption professional can also mail you printed profiles too, if you prefer. You may review as many families as you want to see! It's even possible to talk with a few of your favorite families, if you need help deciding which family is the right one to adopt your baby.

Dear Mardie:

"No one will accept my choice. No one cares about my news. Where can I turn?"

Mardie's Advice:

Making an adoption plan is a very personal and individual decision. Some women want to share their plans with friends. Other women are more private and let no one know. You may not have anyone to speak to. If that is the case, please call or text Lifetime Adoption at any time, day or night, at 1-800-923-6784.

There are families for all children regardless of age, race, or medical condition.

You can view profiles of adoptive parents, even while you're just learning about adoption. Looking at waiting families may help you decide how you feel about adoption for your baby.

When you're ready, your adoption professional will help you set up a time to talk or meet with the adoptive family or families of your choice.

Here are some things to consider as you learn about the adoptive families available:

- * Does the race of the adoptive parents matter to you?
- * Do you want your child raised in a particular state or area?
- * Do you think that you would like them to be in the city or country? Near mountains or the ocean?
- * How important is it for them to grow up with a brother or sister?
- * What faith do you want them to be brought up with?
- * How important is it to be active in sports or outdoor activities?
- * Are there hobbies or interests you want your child to grow up with?
- * Are pets important?
- * Extended family, grandparents?

6. Speak with potential families

You have the opportunity to speak with one or more potential adoptive families. If you feel uncomfortable or nervous talking with the family by yourself, your adoption professional can join you in a phone or video conference. Take all the time you need to ask questions and get to know them, at your comfort level.

After speaking to the family, you may have an idea if they are what you are seeking for your child. If you aren't yet sure, you can speak with more families. Your coordinator will be happy to arrange whatever you need as you make your choice.

Here is a list of possible questions you may wish to ask the family:

- 1.) Why are you adopting?
- 2.) Do you have any other children? Were they adopted?
- 3.) What are the other children's ages, talents, and interests?
- 4.) What do you do for a living and are you financially able to provide for a child?
- 5.) Do you both work? Who will care for the child when you are not with him or her?
- 6.) How do you envision your adopted child's future? Hopes and dreams?
- 7.) How do you plan to discipline? Spankings, time-outs, or reward systems?
- 8.) What are your hobbies and family activities?
- 9.) Do you attend church regularly? What religion are you, and how do you practice your faith?
- 10.) What kind of connection do you hope to have with me during the adoption process and after we finalize? Are you open to exchanging letters, photos, or social media and having phone calls, texts, or occasional visits?

If you aren't sure how to answer the adoptive parents' questions, or if you have any concerns, let them and your adoption

Dear Mardie:

"I feel like I don't have a say in what happens to my child, is this true?"

Mardie's Advice:

You have the right to be involved in all phases of the adoption process.

You have the right to:

...have answers to all of your questions, and develop a relationship with the adoptive family.

...see, hold, and spend time with your baby at birth.

...talk to, meet with, and choose the adoptive family.

...be treated with dignity and respect for your loving decision.

...have future contact, including updates and visits, if you want.

professional know. You are not obligated to speak with them further if you don't want to.

If you are in need of financial assistance for pregnancy related expenses, please be sure to discuss this with your adoption professional as these issues need to be handled by the attorney working on your adoption. It may seem awkward to discuss financial matters with the adoptive family so leave this to your adoption coordinator.

Above all, keep in mind that no matter whom you choose it is your child's best interest that should always come first.

You can start your adoption anytime. When you are ready, you may talk with the family (or families) of your choice. Even if you call from the hospital in labor or you are a parent of an older child, you will have the opportunity to get to know the family and build a relationship.

7. A match is made

You will be considered “matched” with the adoptive parents once you have spoken with them, and both parties feel comfortable moving forward together.

If at any time you sense that the adoptive family is not such a good fit, please let your adoption professional know right away. Open communication is vital to the success of your adoption. Making sure that your needs and the needs of your child are being met is just one part of the adoption professional’s role.

When you are matched with an adoptive family, you legally have no obligation. Just be sure to leave yourself enough time to find another family if you decide that this one isn’t right for you. If you are struggling with your decision, turn to your adoption professional for support and advice.

It’s important that you stay in touch with your adoption professional by calling, texting or emailing regularly. They will help you with the resources you need during the adoption process, including licensed counseling and peer support. You will also be connected with an adoption attorney, at no cost to you, to discuss any legal questions and the process.

You and the adoptive family will continue to build your relationship throughout your pregnancy. It is a good time to learn about each other, and share with each other. You can discuss your hospital plan and other plans as you continue through your pregnancy.

8. Plan for delivery

Your adoption coordinator will notify the hospital about your wishes for when you give birth, such as who you want in the room with you, if you want to see and hold your baby, and more. When you go into labor you should notify your adoption professional. In most cases the baby will be discharged from the hospital to the adoptive family about the same time you are released.

If you need to make a last-minute adoption plan from the hospital, call or text the National Adoption Hotline to get started: 1-800-923-6602. Caring help is available 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

Concern about Child Protective Services

If you have used drugs or are in a situation that may put you and your child at risk of getting Child or Family Services (CPS or DCF) involved, you should know there is an alternative to Foster Care for your child. Consider making an adoption plan while you still have a say over your child's future. Get private, confidential, non-judgmental answers to your questions when you call or text 1-800-923-6602, available 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

With adoption, you could give your child a stable, healthy future, and still be a part of his life! You can choose the adoptive family for your newborn or older children, and if desired, receive updates and have ongoing contact after the adoption.

It's important you take action to learn your options with adoption. Get answers before your choices are no longer yours to make.

9. Sign legal documents

You will meet with an attorney or adoption service provider who will advise you of your rights and help you review the legal documents required to complete this part of the adoption. This may be done in the hospital or a different location after you have been discharged.

10. Heal

You will need to take time to heal your body and your heart. Give yourself time; plan for this. Be patient. (For more information on giving yourself time to heal, see chapter 9.)

CHAPTER SEVEN:

Taking Care of You...

With so much going on, such as mixed emotions, hormonal changes, and thoughts about the future, you might feel overwhelmed. It's ok to take care of your needs and make healthy choices. Taking care of yourself will help you feel better emotionally and physically during your pregnancy.

Doctor's appointments

Try to keep all your doctor's appointments. Even if you have had a child before, it is good to receive prenatal care during this pregnancy. If you have trouble getting there, let your adoption professional or adoptive family know. Doctor's appointments are important to you and your baby's health. If you would like, ask the adoptive mother to come with you to your appointments. The adoptive father may come as well, if you are comfortable with this or he can stay in the waiting room. Having the adoptive family at the appointments can be a great time to get to know them. They can be a wonderful source of support.

The family will appreciate the chance to know how you are feeling, as well as the health of the baby. When you have your ultrasounds, you may want to share copies with the adoptive family. Sharing updates from your doctor's appointments is a great way to keep them involved and supportive of your health.

First visit to the doctor or medical clinic

Your first visit may be longer than others, so plan some time. You may feel more comfortable if you bring a friend to the appointment. If you have little ones, bring someone to watch them in the waiting room while you are being examined. There may be a lot of paperwork to be completed.

The doctor will need to know about your adoption plan. Once you know the name of the doctor or clinic that will be caring for you, let your adoption professional know. She will handle the paperwork to obtain the medical records she needs regarding your pregnancy.

Typically you will go to the doctor every four weeks for the first seven months. After that, you'll go more often, such as every one to two weeks until you give birth.

During the pregnancy, there should be an exchange of ideas. Consider what your doctor suggests and why. It's important that you share your hospital preferences with your doctor as you prepare for your due date. Your adoption professional will fax a copy of your hospital plan to the hospital as well. Remember that your doctor has experience that can be valuable to you during pregnancy and delivery.

Mental health

Try to keep an eye on your mental health and your emotions. You may feel weepy during your pregnancy. If you start to feel unusually depressed, let your doctor, adoption professional or adoptive parents know at once. Here are some signs of depression:

- ✿ Inability to sleep due to anxiety
- ✿ Inability to find enjoyment in your life
- ✿ Feelings of sadness or anxiety that last longer than two weeks
- ✿ Eating too much or too little
- ✿ Obsessive thoughts that won't go away
- ✿ Thoughts of suicide

Some of these thoughts are normal at times. However, when they begin to get in the way of your normal daily life, it's time to ask for help. Reach out to your adoption professional for support.

Weight and pregnancy

Don't try to lose weight during your pregnancy; it will hurt both you and the baby. Your doctor will give you guidelines on the normal amount of weight to gain, based on your height and on your weight before you became pregnant.

The baby is going to use nutrients from you and if you don't replenish your body you will suffer. If you are having trouble getting the proper foods, please let your adoption professional know about it immediately.

Tips for overcoming nausea

If you are suffering from nausea, try to eat smaller meals throughout the day. Quite often, when you get up in the morning, your tummy will be full of acid.

A little bread or a saltine cracker can do the trick by soaking up any acid left over from the night before; also ginger ale and carbonated beverages can help. SEA Bands™ are cloth bands that are worn on your wrists and can help reduce nausea. These bands can be found in drug stores. If you can't afford them or can't find them, let your adoption professional or adoptive parents know and they can send you some. Your doctor may have additional tips on how to manage nausea during pregnancy.

Finding prenatal care

You may already have a doctor you prefer to see for your prenatal care (health care for you while you are pregnant). If you don't have insurance, you can apply for state-funded health insurance or emergency Medicaid, allowing you to see a doctor right away.

Find OB-GYN doctors (physicians specializing in female reproductive systems) in your area by checking your insurance provider's preferred doctor list, asking a friend who she uses, or searching the internet or a local phone book. Search online with keywords such as "doctors," "physicians," "women's health care," "obstetrics," and "gynecology," along with the city and state you live in (such as "obstetrics in Tampa, FL"). You can also go to OptionLine.org to find free pregnancy care centers near you.

Drug and alcohol use

You may have used drugs or alcohol before you knew you were pregnant, or you may be continuing to use. Be honest about the type of drug use and frequency of use so that your doctor can best care for your health and the health of the baby. There can be long term health effects with continued substance use.

Although it may seem tempting to hide any drug or alcohol use, it is very helpful for both the adoptive professional and the adoptive families to know everything up front. Even if you've used once or regularly, there are adoptive families who are ready and willing to adopt a child who has had exposure to drugs or alcohol. Whatever your situation, honesty is best, so that you and your baby can get the help needed.

A SPECIAL NOTE:

Be aware that if you are using drugs, or if you or your baby test positive for drugs when you give birth, the hospital staff may be required to notify Child Protective Services.

You always have the right to make an adoption plan! Having an adoption plan in place will ensure your baby goes to adoptive parents of your choice, and help you and your baby avoid involvement with Foster Care.

Caring for yourself

It's important to take care of yourself throughout your pregnancy. Getting the proper medical care and diet can make all the difference in the world, for you and your baby.

Prenatal vitamins and a balanced diet can keep your emotions steady and your body strong. Some foods or medicines may cause risk or harm to your baby. Always ask a doctor if you're not sure if you should eat or take something. Try to avoid caffeine, raw seafood, unpasteurized milk, soft cheeses (as they contain bacteria that can harm your baby), and herbs or herbal tea (unless approved by your doctor). Even if you've had a baby before, remember every pregnancy is different. It's best to see a doctor and get good care, for the health of you and your baby.

If you need help with pregnancy care, or if you have concerns during this pregnancy, ask your adoption professional. She can arrange to find the care you need for a healthy pregnancy.

Questions for Your Doctor

Sometimes it's easy to forget your questions when you're at your doctor's appointment. Here are a few questions to ask your doctor:

- When is my baby's due date?
- How can I get a proof of pregnancy?
- What foods or activities should I avoid? Do I need vitamins?
- Will you be the one delivering my baby?
- Which hospital will I have my baby at? Will I need a c-section?
- What is labor like? How will I know when I'm in labor?
- Is there anything my insurance won't cover?
- Are you willing to speak with the adoption professional I've chosen?
- Can I get information about the WIC program? (if applicable)
- Share any symptoms or changes you've had lately.
- Can I bring the adoptive parents I've chosen to my appointment? (if desired)
- When is my next appointment?

Please Note: Some doctors have not had experience with women choosing adoption. Speak with your adoption professional if you would like her to notify your doctor about your adoption plan.

CHAPTER EIGHT:

Planning for Delivery...

Planning your adoption day

Getting ready for your baby's delivery can be a nervous and anxious time. It can help to prepare a little ahead of time, so that you have less to think about when your contractions start, or when your doctor wants you to start the labor process.

Many women who are choosing adoption for their child feel uneasy packing their hospital bag. Your adoption professional may have tips for what you'll need at the hospital.

Visit BirthmotherBlessings.com or call/text 1-800-923-6602 to request a FREE hospital labor bag with some of the necessities for women choosing adoption.

Here is a list of things you can do in advance of your adoption day:

- 1) Tour the labor and delivery area of the hospital. Ask about pre-registering.
- 2) Plan to take time off work. You may qualify for pregnancy/disability leave before and after the birth. Check with your physician and your employer for the proper documents.
- 3) Sign up for childbirth classes, if this knowledge would be helpful to you.
- 4) If you have other children, arrange for someone to take care of them while you are in the hospital.
- 5) Have your bag packed and ready to go.
- 6) Decide who will pick you up from the hospital when you are discharged.
- 7) Decide how you want things to go at the hospital and tell your adoption professional. She will communicate your wishes to the hospital.
 - ❁ Who do you want to be at the hospital with you when you deliver?
 - ❁ Do you want your baby in the room with you, or would you prefer your baby be kept in the nursery, or with the adoptive parents?
 - ❁ After you deliver, do you want to be in a different area of the hospital away from the labor and delivery area?
 - ❁ How much do you want the adoptive parents to participate in the birth? Do you want them in the delivery room or waiting outside?
 - ❁ Will you want newborn pictures that the hospital takes of your baby?
 - ❁ When you are discharged, do you want to wait until the baby leaves or do you wish to leave first?

What do I do when I go into labor?

Let your adoption professional know when your labor starts and when you leave for the hospital or when you get there. Your adoption professional will inform the hospital staff of your adoption plan and make sure they have your hospital preferences and wishes on file. Give the labor nurse your adoption professional's phone number and ask her to call them. Your adoption professional can notify the adoptive parents that you are in labor, or you may want to call or text them yourself.

"I know I did the right thing..."

I was shocked to find out I was pregnant again. I had no job, my life was a mess and I didn't want another child, especially under the circumstances. I'd had a one-night stand with some guy at a party. My first reaction was fear. I couldn't imagine being a single parent of two. I couldn't go through with an abortion. I decided on adoption and called an adoption center.

I went through the process of choosing a family. I talked to a couple of families and I had a chance to meet the family I liked best. It was a great experience. They were wonderful people. I really felt for them in their struggle to have a baby. I decided that they were the ones who deserved to raise my child. They were very supportive through the rest of my pregnancy.

We talked every week and became good friends through all this. Then, when it came time for the birth they came to my hometown. They stayed until I left the hospital three days later. It was a wonderful time! It made me happy to see the joy in their lives. I hated to see them go. We still keep in touch and I always know how my baby is doing, as well as knowing he's in good hands. Now I can go on and make a better life for myself and my oldest. It was a tough choice, but I know I did the right thing for me and my children.

Dawn

What happens at the hospital?

You will be taken into a labor room where your labor will be monitored. In most hospitals, this may be the same room you give birth in or you may be taken to what is traditionally called a “delivery room” when you are ready.

The nursing staff will attach a heart monitor to your tummy to make sure everything is going well with the baby. If you have attended childbirth classes, you will know what to expect during your labor. If not, the nurses are very helpful. Remember that you have rights and this is your birth and your adoption plan, so don't let anyone talk you out of what you want.

You decide who you want or don't want in the delivery room with you. Make sure the person with you is positive and well-informed before inviting them to your delivery.

Before you leave the hospital

You are encouraged to see and hold your baby. It is very healing and can help you in the grieving process. Take the time you need with your child. You can take photos; keep the baby's ID bracelet, and/or footprints.

Don't leave the hospital until you are ready. If you had a C-section, you will have to stay longer to prevent infection. If you want, you can have a small ceremony to celebrate placing your child with the adoptive parents.

Did you know you can name your baby?

Naming your child allows you to create a special bond. You may want to decide with the adoptive parents, or you may want a personal name, realizing that the adoptive parents will be naming the child also. One adoptive family honored their boy's birth mother by keeping the first and middle names that his birth father had given him; they used them as their son's middle names.

Remember that all situations are different, but open, honest communication is the place to start.

Paula's Story

One day I discovered I was pregnant and facing the most difficult decision of my life. My thoughts changed overnight with the realization of the life that grew inside of me. As my pregnancy progressed, I had to decide if my current situation was best for my child, or if there were ways to make my circumstances work out for a child. I thought the realities of single parenthood would not be fair to my child.

When I went to my next doctor's appointment I saw a brochure about adoption in the waiting room. I began to see adoption as a way I could provide my daughter with parents who could raise her with every opportunity and stability I couldn't offer yet. After many hours of prayer and soul-searching, I decided to make an adoption plan for my baby.

I took the time to research prospective families with Lifetime Adoption Center and found a family whom I truly loved. Finding them made me more sure about my decision. I wanted them involved in my pregnancy and I had chosen my baby's adoptive mother to be my labor partner. She went to every doctor's appointment with me and we would get breakfast afterward. During this time spent together we got to know one another very well and became good friends. I felt that it was important to spend the time and effort to get to know my child's adoptive parents.

A few months later I delivered a beautiful, healthy baby girl. The time spent in the hospital was precious; together with my daughter's parents, I was able to care for her. We spent two days in the hospital sharing with friends and family the beautiful life that I had created. It was a time of love and laughter. Emotions ran high in those few hours, but the one that was most present was LOVE!

After we parted and went home, I with my family and my daughter with hers, I knew that my daughter would be loved and cared for in every way. I love my daughter with all my heart, and because of that love I was able to give her everything I had always wanted for her. Open adoption was the very best plan for my daughter, Alexandra.

Today I am able to share my story with others with the hope of educating as many people as possible about the benefits of open adoption. As a birth mother, I will never have to hide behind a veil of secrecy, and I will always know how my daughter is doing. I do wish I had been in a position to parent her myself, but I am so very excited for the life she will be able to lead due to open adoption. Each and every day I think of my daughter and know that she is loved, safe, and thriving in her family.

I can see from the photos and letters that her adoptive parents regularly send me that she is growing into a lovely young girl. The relationship that my daughter's adoptive parents and I share is one I know will last a lifetime.

CHAPTER NINE:

Getting Through & Moving Forward...

Before, during, and after your adoption, take time for yourself. Choosing adoption for your child is a life-changing event. Don't be hard on yourself; it is not realistic to expect everything to go back to the way it used to be. You will change from this experience. Acknowledging that this is the right decision for you is the first thing you can do to help yourself.

After delivery, you are still in the post-pregnancy hormone adjustment stage. It might be difficult to look at anything with much clarity, but it will get better. Concentrate on letting your body heal itself from pregnancy and birth.

Your feelings

Remember, just because you feel sadness, it doesn't mean your decision was wrong. Sometimes you will have grief that may not surface for a few weeks or months. When those times come, seek

Dear Mardie:

"I still have weight to lose from my pregnancy and this makes me think of my baby. Is this normal?"

Mardie's Advice:

Be patient with yourself as you heal from labor and adjust to life after pregnancy.

It's normal to think of your baby!

Some women find it helped to focus on the future. Acknowledge your feelings and try to focus on why you chose adoption. Speaking to other women who have gone through adoption can help too. You will never forget your child, but with time the feelings will be less intense. One day those feelings may even be comforting. Tell your adoption professional if you want to talk to another birth mother or a counselor.

help from professionals or other birthmoms. Sometimes you just need to talk, and have someone who understands listen. Contact your adoption professional for support, mentoring, or counseling options available by phone, online, or in person. Your doctor may have counseling referrals as well.

Hormonal changes continue after delivery, and many women experience "baby blues" where they feel extra tired or emotionally sensitive for a short time. Tell your doctor if you're struggling. Remember, it's okay to ask for help.

If you have a history of depression or mental illness, your symptoms may worsen after giving birth. Get help immediately, stay on your medication and talk with your doctor.

After the adoption it's key to get trusted and caring support, and focus on the future. You may have mixed emotions, such as grief or missing your baby, at the same time feeling proud and glad for what you've given your child. You might even feel hope for what's ahead with open adoption or your own goals. Every woman processes her feelings after adoption differently.

What can you do today?

Surround yourself with positive, understanding people who support your decision. Some women also find journaling or writing helpful for processing their emotions. In this time, you can make healthy changes in your life, such as going back to school or church, getting a new job, making new friends, setting goals, and learning new things.

Try to protect yourself while you are healing. It helps to stay away from anything or anyone that could lead to unhealthy choices. If you have a weakness, like drugs, alcohol, or attraction to the wrong guys, seek help from a counselor trained in that area. Making healthy choices will benefit you now and long-term.

Whenever we lose something or someone, we feel some level of grief and your heart may be heavy for a while. It is normal to feel grief after the adoption. As time passes, the pain and sadness will fade. You will never forget your child, but the feelings get easier.

Take pride in having given your child life and the best possible environment in which to live and grow.

Ongoing contact

After you have been discharged from the hospital and your baby is with his or her adoptive parents, you will begin the healing process and moving forward to reach your own goals. During this time, you may consider the kind of contact you want with your child after the adoption.

"If I hadn't chosen adoption, I wouldn't have seen the joy it brought to the couple that couldn't have children.

- Lisa in Kansas

Do you want to have an ongoing relationship with your child and his or her adoptive parents? You might have already talked with the adoptive parents about this, and it can help to confirm the plan for future communication with them again. Even if you're not sure how you'll feel about contact right now, it helps to talk about how they can honor your wishes. With adoption today, many adoptive parents will respect your need for space and be happy to share updates or photos when you feel ready for them!

Here are a few ways some women share contact with their child and his or her adoptive family:

- ❁ Exchanging or receiving letters or cards with photos by mail
- ❁ Phone calls, video chats, or text messaging
- ❁ Following each other on social media, sometimes on a private account
- ❁ In-person visits once or twice a year, or as agreed
- ❁ Sharing photos or milestones by email or an online sharing platform
- ❁ Sending updates to the adoption professional to forward as needed

The level of contact you have with your child and the adoptive family may change over time, as with any personal relationship. If you are honest and open with the adoptive parents, then everyone can communicate with your child's best interest at heart.

Dear Mardie: “I keep hearing throughout my pregnancy that I should plan for my future after the adoption, is this selfish?”

Mardie’s Advice: Looking forward and into your future can help you focus on the reason for your adoption. Remember you are not a bad person for doing so.

Timing is everything and at this time in your life, parenting a child may not be possible. This is a loving and selfless decision women make for their children. Instead of parenting a child, they realize they are not in a position to offer them what they need at this time in their lives.

Dear Mardie: “I seem to think of my child often. Is it normal to feel sad sometimes?”

Mardie’s Advice: You may find yourself remembering your child and what could have been. This is normal. Let the memories come, talk about your feelings and when possible, journal your thoughts. These emotions are part of the post-adoption process, sadness might come and go—it doesn’t stop just because the pregnancy is over. In fact, you might find your emotions building up each year on or around your child’s birthday or placement date. This is very normal.

Dear Mardie: “Is it ok to go out with friends and have fun? I feel so guilty.”

Mardie’s Advice: Having some fun and getting back into life does not mean you don’t love your child. It is not a betrayal. Giving yourself permission to have some fun and happiness is good for you and your healing, just like you must give yourself permission to grieve when you have the need.

Dear Mardie: “My friends and family are always trying to cheer me up. Sometimes they don’t even know how to respond to me. What can I do to let them know how I feel?”

Mardie’s Advice: You may want to share some boundaries with concerned friends who are determined not to let you be sad or alone. Remember, they may not be sure how to handle your feelings. Let others know what you need and how they can best help you. Don’t feel pressured into doing things you don’t want to do or don’t feel up to – just to keep others happy. Decide what and how much you need, and then share these feelings with others.

“I know I can have a positive place in the world. I also know that by continuing my education I can set an example for other women in my situation –that you can do anything you put your mind to. I can also become an example for my child. I know he will be proud.”

- Jessica, a Lifetime Adoption Foundation Scholarship Recipient

Your future, goals, and dreams

Your future is up to you. You have given your child a bright future. Now it is time to give yourself the gift of a future with a plan. It's okay for you to dream of a different future and to create the life you really want.

Creating your future

It is helpful to take little steps toward your future. Think of the reasons you chose adoption. Most likely, your loving choice was as much for your child's benefit as it was for your own future.

- ❁ Where do you want to go or what would you want to do?
- ❁ Have you wanted to be on your own or live in a different place?
- ❁ Do you want to finish high school or go to college?
- ❁ Do you plan to get a job or do you want another job?
- ❁ Is there a habit you need to change to get or stay healthy?
- ❁ What are your talents, experience, abilities, and dreams?
- ❁ Do you need training to build on top of skills you already have?
- ❁ What have I learned through this experience, about myself or what is possible for my future?
- ❁ What do you want for yourself one year from now? What do you hope to see 5-10 years from now?

Set a goal and determine what the next step is. How can you take a step today to get you where you want to go tomorrow?

Adoption changes you

Adoption is a unique and personal experience that will change you. You may find you're able help or have more compassion for a friend going through a situation like yours. Some people in your life may not fully understand what you've been through. As things come up, talk with your adoption professional, a counselor, a trusted loved one, a pastor, or your boyfriend or husband. You might worry about sex or another unplanned pregnancy, or feel unsure how your relationship with your other children, friends, or partner will look after this. It's normal to need help processing what you're thinking about and what you've been through.

Life after adoption

Whatever you decide to do, your life will change. Women who choose adoption can plan ahead for how they'll handle the changes and adjust to life after the adoption.

Give yourself time to process what you've been through.

This can be a healthy, healing time if you are honest and loving with yourself.

"Don't shut down."

At times I felt so alone. Trusting a couple close people to listen or be a comfort really helped. My adoption coordinator was also a big help after the adoption.

She arranged for me to talk with a counselor and with another woman who chose adoption. It helped to talk with people who understood what I was going through."

Sheeryl

"Ask for help."

Sometimes I felt like I had to have all the answers. I learned to reach out before I felt overwhelmed. Speak up when you need information, a helping hand, or direction for the next step.

People want to help."

Latricia

“Focus on the good.”

I thought about the reasons I chose this plan and of all the things I gave my son through adoption. It helped knowing I would stay in touch with him and his adoptive family.

I like knowing they think of me and that I'm a part of their lives. It's like we're a big extended family!”

~Ardi

“Write a letter.”

It helped writing to my daughter and her family, even if I didn't send it to them. I'd write about my feelings of love, my dreams for her, why I was thinking of her, what I want her to know about me or my family... whatever was on my heart.”

“Have patience.”

I had to give myself grace to go through things at my own pace. I took time for my feelings and experience.

Through my daughter's adoption, I learned to be kind to myself and set healthy goals for my life.”

~Shannon

"I could never give my baby away..."

Karisa's Story

I always wanted to be a mom, but when I got pregnant I wasn't ready at all. When someone mentioned adoption I thought, 'I could never give my baby away!' I didn't think I could have my baby and know my child was out there in the world without me. Since I still wasn't sure what to do, I decided to research adoption.

I found out how much adoption has changed and learned about open adoption. It was a way to give my baby a life, and a way I could be a good mom by choosing adoptive parents to raise her.

I knew I wasn't yet able to be the kind of mom I wanted for my daughter. Adoption would be hard, but so would raising a baby with no job or money, no dad to help, no place of my own... I didn't want my child to miss out, and I wanted to do right by her.

Today my daughter knows who I am and why I chose adoption. We have a special connection and I love her parents. Last year she even sent me a note thanking me for giving her this life. Knowing I helped to give her a good future means the world to me. She may have been unexpected but I can't imagine my world without her and her adoptive family.

CHAPTER TEN:

My Adoption Choice...

Placing your child for adoption is a personal choice, one that takes time and consideration to make. Ask any questions and talk to an adoption professional. Know what options are available to you and then take your time to decide.

Your feelings and concerns are yours, but you are not alone with these feelings; they are a normal piece to the larger adoption process. Whether you are just making your decisions now or have completed the adoption of your child, know that you are in good company with thousands of women who have chosen adoption for their child.

Adoption professionals have worked with women from all backgrounds, in different situations and have compassionate answers to your questions. Take the time to explore your options and you'll come to the best decision for you and your child.

This journey takes courage and strength, but you have taken the first step just by choosing to pick up this book.

Knowing your options can bring you peace and encouragement as you continue on your journey.

Remember it's never too late to choose adoption. You can take your time and decide at your own pace.

Once you have made your decision, you can map out your choices for an adoptive family, your adoption plan and your future goals. Know that your adoption professional is available to help you anytime.

For more information or to speak to someone about your options, call or text 1-800-923-6602; there is caring staff available 24 hours a day, 7 days a week.

Dear Mardie:

The last few months have been the hardest stretch in my life. The choices & decisions that I've been faced with will be with me forever. From the beginning you and my adoption coordinator have been there for me, I could not have done this without all of you and your love and support. You will forever be my Lifetime family. I know that I made the right choice for me and my child!

Lizly

Talking it Out...

Women who choose adoption often find it helpful to talk through their experience with a counselor or another mother who chose adoption, especially after the adoption takes place. You may even find that your story helps another person touched by adoption too.

Here are a few questions many women have for counselors and other birth mothers:

For counselors:

- Do you have experience with women who have placed a child for adoption recently?
- What are some things I can do to help my family better understand what I'm going through?
- What are the stages of grief and the signs of those stages?
- Is it okay to feel happy about the adoption, even though I miss my baby sometimes?

For other birth mothers:

- How long ago did your child's adoption take place?

Glossary of Adoption Terms

Adoptee: A child who is adopted and joins a family through adoption.

Adoption Agency: An organization that works with pregnant women and mothers considering adoption for a minor child, providing counseling, answering questions, and assistance with the adoption process. Agencies also work with adoptive parents to help prepare them for open adoption, certifying families as ready to adopt, and teaching them about parenting a child brought into the family through adoption.

Adoption Attorney: A lawyer who specializes in adoption and knows the process completely, providing legal services paid for by the adoptive family.

Adoption Facilitator: An organization who brings together birth families and adoptive parents, assisting in building an adoption plan. Facilitators specialize in meeting the needs of the people in the adoption plan.

Adoption Plan: An individual plan made by the birth mother for the adoption of her child. Includes the type of family she wishes to adopt her child, who will be at the birth and the amount of contact between the adoptive parents, adoptee, and birth parents following the adoption.

Adoption Service Provider (ASP): A licensed social worker who is certified by the state to assist with the placement of a child.

Adoption Triad: The three parties involved in an adoption; birth parents, adoptive parents, and adopted child/children.

Adoptive Parent: A person who becomes the permanent parent through adoption with all the legal rights and moral responsibilities given to any parent.

Birth Father: The child's biological father.

Birth Mother: The child's biological mother.

Birth Parent: Parents who gave birth to a child, made an adoption plan for, and placed that child for adoption.

Closed Adoption: An adoption in near total confidentiality with no contact or ongoing relationship.

Confidentiality: All information kept private and not disclosed.

Consent: Agreement by a parent to relinquish the child for adoption and to release all rights and duties with respect to that child.

Decree of Adoption: A legal order that finalizes an adoption.

Father's Adoption Registry: Created for birth fathers in a few states who want to receive notice if plans are made to place his child for adoption.

Foster Care: An arrangement through a social services agency or court in which someone other than the birth parents care for the child.

Guardian: Person who is legally responsible for the care of a child.

Independent Adoption: An adoption handled by facilitators/agencies and attorneys.

Maternity Home: A home for unmarried pregnant women needing housing.

Open Adoption: Allows the birth mother to have choices about the family that adopts her child, meetings before and/or after the child's birth, ability of adoptive parents to attend the birth, continued relationship between families through letters, photos, videos, or personal visits.

Paternity Testing: Genetic tests that prove or disprove the identity of a child's alleged father.

Profile: A packet that provides information about prospective adoptive parents, usually including photos and letters. Some profiles share more about extended family, religion, lifestyle, home, and hobbies that assist the birth mother in making a choice in adoptive families.

Putative Father: Legal term for the alleged or believed father of a child.

Relinquishment: Voluntary termination of parental rights, releasing the child for adoption.

Semi-open Adoption: An adoption in which some information is shared, but more limited than a fully open adoption.

Special Needs Adoption: Older children, sibling groups, children facing physical, emotional or intellectual challenges may all be considered special needs adoptions.

“I was kind of private about my situation, so this app was a great starting place for me.

I was relieved when I saw I could learn about adoption from the privacy of my own phone, without telling anyone until I was ready. I was able to check out the parents hoping to adopt a child, read stories from other moms who chose adoption, and learn about what adoption is like these days. Once I felt ready to learn more I talked with someone about my questions and what to expect next. Eventually, I even told my mom and we looked through the adoption app together.”

I'm Pregnant, now what?

There are many reasons women, of all backgrounds and circumstances, think about or choose adoption. Whether you just found out about an unplanned pregnancy or have been considering adoption for some time, you are not alone. Take time to consider your choices so you'll make the best plan for you, your child, and your situation. This book offers a look at what modern adoption is like, with compassionate answers and resources to help you.

Did you know?

- 3 out of 5 people are touched by adoption in some way.
- Over 2 million women will face an unplanned pregnancy this year.
- A mother has the say in every step of creating an adoption plan, including on-going contact and updates after the adoption.
- A mother may start an adoption plan any time before or after her baby's birth.

"I wish I had something like this book when I was going through my pregnancy and adoption. It's so good to have guidance during the process, and know you're not alone."

Jessica,
A BIRTH MOTHER

This book provides:

- Honest info about adoption and the process.
- Guidance for talking with people you decide to tell.
- Tips for choosing the best plan for your baby.
- Supportive information for women of all ages.
- Free adoption resources.
